The characteristic features of the mathematical course are that it begins with insentional geometry and carries algebra and demonstrative geometry simultane ously. English and Composition.

Throughout course I. the English will be studied with special reference to the clear and concise expression of thought. As the thought of the student is principally on what he is doing in the school, the essays will be partly on the exercises in which he is daily engaged. The English teachers will by this means have an inexhaustible supply of subjects for composition, while Drawing.

As soon as the efficacy of the treatment with the oxygen gas is firmly established, it is the intention of the hospital authorities to set aside one ward, possibly E ward, for pneumonia cases alone. A sufficient number of tanks to accommodate any amount of patients will be provided, one attendant being able to serve half a dozen patients. With the facilities at hand, the first outlay would be the greatest, and suffering humanity would be benefited a hundredfold. Local physicians, who have watched the experiments with great in-courses, one for boys (VIII.), and one for girls (IX.). The boys' course consists of a series of carefully graded shop exercises in wood and iron to be worked out from mechanical drawings. The girls' course consists of a series of exercises with the needle and sewing machine, commencing with elementary processes and leading up through the finer exercises in embroidery, and the working out of original designs. The millinery work has, in addition to its practical value, an educational value in the study of line and form, as applied to frame making, in the principles of harmony of colors, in the chemistry of dyeing and cleaning, and its correlating with the study of chemistry. During the fourth year the cooking laboratory work is supplemented by general household economy. This work is not merely practical, but rises to the dignity of laboratory work of the science departments, and is correlated with English, mathematics, physics and chemistry. History and Economics.

The primary aim of this course is to teach The primary aim of this course is to teach boys and girls, in the light of past and current events, how to become good American citizens. All history, whether ancient, medieval or modern, will be studied in its relation to modern times. The work of the school room will aim to stimulate, rather than to crowd, the memory, the object being to make the student willing and able to help himself to the recorded experience of the race. The work will be supplemented by essays prepared by the student on leading topics, by a close correlation with English, and by frequent illustrated talks.

How the Pupil Selects His Course, On entering the school, the first-year pupil looks down the first term column of wishes to take, but as there are only thirty school periods per week, he must not select more subjects than whose periods aggregate thirty hours. The subjects are so varied in character, exercising, by turn,
the head, hand and eye, that every period
may be filled without undue fatigue. Pupils will not be required to prepare more than three lessons outside of school hours, as the work in the laboratories, the drawing and the manual training will be done wholly under the supervision of the teachers.

Irregular Pupils.

Irregular Pupils.

In order to accommodate pupils from the overcrowded Central high school, or pupils from other similar schools, provision will be made for organizing classes in all the branches tabulated, so that pupils can adjust themselves easily to the new conditions, and graduate without loss of time. For example, a pupil from the Central school will receive credit for the branches he has completed there; he looks on the schedule and finds the branches, or their equivalent, required to finish the course he has begun, and is admitted to them, although they may be found in a different term from those in the Central school.

The language, as shown in the schedule, includes four year courses in German and French, and a two years' course in Latin, subject, however, to modification, according to demand.

This course (XIV.) covers about the same ground usually found in commercial schools, which do the work in six months. In this school it is given two hours each week and is woven into the warp and woof
